What's your problem space?

Poetry – the word itself can incite frustration, joy, nostalgia, derision, and most often, shrugs. For something that can cause such varied and strong emotions, poetry gets little notice from a vast majority of people. A huge cause of low readership is the general lack of exposure to poetry had by all but the most heavily engaged readers and poets themselves. The amount and quality of exposure readers have to poetry greatly impacts the perception they have of it, as well as their willingness to further engage with it in the future, especially considering the abundance of other entertainment options readily available.

What's your proposed solution?

To create a sustainable level of engagement, I've designed a system that pairs the immediacy and interest of the physical environment with the convenience and power of the web to re-present poetry to potential young adult readers, while maintaining an environment that can engage current readers.

What's your business model?

I have not figured out a way to monetize the value of this system. It would most likely rely on partnerships with non-profits or brands looking for interesting ways to connect with consumers

Finding an audience will help you find your business model

Who's your main audience? From the problem and solution, it's hard to imagine how to monetize this. Who do you think will pay for poetry?

What types of partnerships are you imagining?

Narrowing down the types of organizations that you think you could partner with might make it more manageable to approach them with a proposal. I think you should start local.

Bio

Well, I'm really great. Super smart, very charming, very confident, and a great writer. You wish you could write as fun of copy as I do. Is this one step up from Lorem Ipsum? Should I have put in other placeholder text? Does it matter? Probably not, but I really don't think any of you are reading this. If you are, tweet me @ajservis with #thereaintnocopylikealiserviscausealiserviscopyscopy (but try reading that first).
